ANALYSIS

NFL keeps the foot in the game

BY BARRY WILNER
Associated Press

Call it the Kicking Kraze or the Field Goal Frenzy. Whatever you prefer, the foot is definitely a major part of pro football through three weeks.

Most notably, from long range.

Through those three weeks, there have been 36 attempts at 50-yard or longer field goals, the most in a season over the last dozen years. And 23 have gone through, though Justin Tucker's NFL-record 66-yarder to lift Baltimore past Detroit last Sunday - the spotlight kick at least until someone else nails a longer one - needed a friendly bounce off the crossbar.

There's both an art and a science to field goal accuracy, as Mike Westhoff, generally considered the best special teams coach in NFL history, points out.

"The kickers are better than ever," says Westhoff, who spent 32 years in the NFL and has a book, "Figure It Out," that will be available for purchase next spring. "They work hard, are bigger and stronger and more athletic. When put in optimum conditions, I am not surprised a 66-yard field goal can be made."

Here are some factors Westhoff says have changed the kicking game for the better.

- Specific balls, called K-balls, that are used only for kickers.

In 1999, the competition committee ruled that 12 for each game will be used exclusively during kicking.

"Each team gets the balls marked with a K," Westhoff says, "and they have a time limit to get that ball prepared. Most guys take a piece of Astro-turf and buff the ball just like you would shine your shoes. It even darkens the color of the ball, and makes it more pliable. ... They emphasize one ball and buff that ball because that is the one they want to kick.

"Also it's a friendly ball because when that foot hits, the ball is more pliable, his foot goes into the ball, basically, and the ball constricts and it expands and explodes when he hits it."

- Defensive line restrictions.

Westhoff was involved in a rules change that prohibited defenders from lining up over the snapper.

"Back in the early 2000s, I helped (then NFL officiating chief) Mike Pereira with that change; it had gotten pretty violent," he says. "So you had to create a box around the center where no one could align, and they're not allowed to line up on the guard and then drive into the center.
